and that he was going to lecture to the American people about this. I saw that he had uttered falsehoods about my country. Then I decided to kill him and kill myself."

As Stevens got out of the "gasoline bus" the Fairmont used to transport guests, Chun ran up and fired a revolver at him at point-blank range. But it misfired, and Chun began beating Stevens with the gun's butt, trying to blind him. Stevens fought back, beating Chun with his fists and chasing him down the street. At this moment, Chang, who had been watching a few yards away, ran forward with a gun concealed in a handkerchief and fired. The shot missed Stevens and hit Chun, who crumpled to the ground. Chang fired twice more at Stevens' back, striking him under his right shoulder blade and above his right hip.

As Stevens collapsed in the arms of the Japanese Consul General, who was accompanying him to the ferry, Chang and the wounded Chun tried to escape down

Durham White Stevens was a high-ranking representative of the Japanese government, which was in the process of annexing Korea and brutally suppressing Korean attempts to resist.

East Street (Embarcadero). A mob began chasing them, shouting, "Lynch the Japs! They've killed a white man!" Chang and Chun were rescued by two SF policemen, who arrested them and took them to Harbor Hospital, the same hospital where Stevens had been transported. As Chang walked past Stevens, he shouted at him, "You are a traitor to my country! You are paid by Japan to ruin my people! You do nothing but wring money from us."

The hospital released a statement saying that Stevens was "resting easily" and "his general condition is hopeful." Stevens himself said, "I don't feel any pain. Is that a bad sign?"

It apparently was. Stevens died two days later of severe internal injuries.

The San Francisco Chronicle wrote of the shooting, "In Corea (sic) the story of the shooting will be heard by a captive people with fanatic praise. In Japan the report will be regarded with contrary emotions. All the diplomatic world will be stirred by the assassination of the American who had served the Japanese well, if not wisely."

Chun was charged with being an accessory to murder, but was released from prison just three months later and fled the country. Chang was convicted of second-degree manslaughter and sentenced to 25 years at San Quentin, but was paroled after 10 years. He returned to Korea in 1927, but the Japanese government forced him to leave again. After returning to the United States, suffering from ill health, he committed suicide in San Francisco in 1930 and was buried at Cypress Lawn Cemetery. His body was repatriated in 1975 and buried in the National Cemetery in Seoul. The Korean government posthumously awarded Chang the Independence Medal of Honor for his efforts on behalf of Korean independence.
